BLIND RECKONING

SIGHT RESTORED TO THE BLIND—WALK IN

THAT sign hung over the door at No. 8 N. Baker Street. It was a new sign. The doctor who lived there had only recently arrived in Midvale.

Dr. Leo Brunn was a heavy, sad-eyed man in his early fifties, with a hint at goatee and a black mustache. He was a good mixer and already had been invited to join the various civic organizations, which invitations he had accepted.

The good doctor was going to be a great asset to the town, everybody thought. After all, hadn't he brought fame to Midvale? Dr. Brunn was well known as a famous eye specialist, graduate of several foreign universities, and a decent chap all around.

"But how the devil is the fellow going to restore sight to people with their optic nerve gone?" demanded Dr. Hobbson, local eye medic, of Mr. Knight, president of the Rotary.

"Well, of course," said Knight, "don't suppose he can do that; I don't think he claims to do any miracles—although you've got to admit he did a sort of miracle on that Johnson kid."

"That Johnson kid" had become something of a miracle boy in the whole state; the whole nation for that matter. Dr. Brunn had given him sight—a lad who had been born without it.

"Granted," said Dr. Hobbson. "But that's different; he had the materials to work on in that case. But his sign is still misleading."

Mr. Knight grinned. "You're just scared he'll take all your business, Hobbson. Isn't that it?"

Hobbson growled, then lapsed into silence. That's the way all arguments ended when it came to discussing the new Dr. Brunn. He had performed some astounding operations on the blind.

But of course Dr. Brunn's amazing work in the realm of sight was not all successful. Whose is, in whatever line? There had been several blind folks who had not been helped by his ministrations. They didn't blame him; other doctors had tried before him. But Dr. Brunn was a humane chap; he never charged those he couldn't help.

"One thing about Dr. Brunn," a certain blind man told a friend, also in darkness, "he always operates, even when the case has been called hopeless. He says there isn't such a thing as absolutely hopeless."

The other blind man nodded. "Of course. Are you going to him?"

"I've about made up my mind to do so. It costs a thousand dollars if he restores your sight. Nothing, if he doesn't."

As a matter of record, five blind persons went under the knife at Dr. Brunn's office during the next two weeks. One of them got back his sight. The other four, condemned to darkness forever, were nevertheless happy over the whole thing: now they could relax, knowing there was no cure. Dr. Brunn had said so.

It wasn't only local people who called on Dr. Brunn. Patients came from all over the country. He had a fine reputation. They came in large cars, in planes. They came with special nurses, and with a private physician in attendance. All these went away with new sight. It was rumored that these wealthy patients paid enormous sums to get back their sight. $50,000 one of them was reported to have paid.

"I'd give a million, if I had it," one blind woman was heard to state.

And most sightless people would.

Dr. Roberts' chief assistant, Leroy, had been complaining of failing sight for some months. Leroy was mighty efficient. Dr. Roberts could ill afford to dispense with his services, although he knew that the man was getting to the place where he was not to be trusted with dangerous acids in the various tests they made.

"What about this Dr. Brunn at Midvale?" Dr. Roberts said one day.

Leroy said, "I've heard of him. Seems to be doing some astonishing work with the blind. There is a chance— But I'll hang on a little while longer, Dr. Roberts. This may be a passing thing."

It wasn't a passing thing. Leroy was stone blind one morning, and his wife called Dr. Roberts' laboratory in a panic. And that afternoon Leroy was in the Roberts' limousine speeding toward Midvale.

Dr. Roberts had been unable to come, so his daughter, Martha, and her fiance, Darrel Dane, went with the blind man.

Dr. Brunn welcomed them to his office. He said that people usually obtained appointments before coming, although he would waive that, seeing that the patient was an eminent scientist.

When they were closeted alone, Dr. Brunn went to work on Leroy.

"You are of course prepared to pay a substantial sum, Mr. Leroy?"

Mr. Leroy said, "Anything, Doctor! Well, anything, that is, within reason. But I can raise a fair amount of cash. Can you start on me at once?"

Dr. Brunn mentally rubbed his hands as he prepared to examine his patient. Here was fifty grand ready at hand! He spent only a short while making the examination. Then he said, "I may as well tell you, Mr. Leroy, you have a stubborn case." He mentioned some unpronounceable eye disease. "And if I cure you, I must ask $50,000. If I cannot cure you, you owe me nothing. Is that satisfactory?"

FEATURE COMICS

Leroy groaned. "It will strap me, but go ahead. I must have my sight!"

Leroy was cured within a few days, and after a week's rest in Dr. Brunn's cozy hospital, he went back to Dr. Roberts' lab, happy but broke.

"Eye grafts," reported Leroy. "He transplanted new corneas on my eyes. A good job. But a stiff price!"

In a small town across the nation, a certain undertaker supervised an operation on a dead man. The man had been blind. Now he lay in his coffin waiting for the funeral. He had died only a short time before.

The doctor working on his eyes made short work of the operation. In a moment he had two filmy tissues in a bottle of liquid. Then he closed the dead man's eyes and said, "Okay, Stebbins. Get on with your funeral."

Eventually the bottle with the two films arrived in Dr. Brunn's office, and he carefully put the contents away in a special vault. The two corneas taken from the dead blind man were utterly worthless; but they were corneas. He had plenty of use for them. He paid well for them, too.

In a single year, the fame of Dr. Brunn had spread around the world. It was no secret that he had put a million dollars in the bank. He cured blind people right and left. The big question was, Where did he get the corneas for transplanting?

When the medical association called on Darrel Dane to look into the secrets of Dr. Brunn, he readily accepted. Although he couldn't see what it mattered—where the doctor obtained his corneas—so long as he cured so many blind cases. What if his fees were high?

"We've got to know," the medical association told Darrel Dane. "Will you help us find out?"

So Darrel went to Dr. Brunn's office one evening and let himself in without troubling to ring the bell. There was the main waiting room and a private room off it. The operating room was to one side.

Darrel stood in the waiting room for a moment, listening to sounds from the operating room. The doctor was in. He well knew that Brunn wouldn't tip his secret unless he actually had to. What was the best plan?

Then Darrel hit on it. Fright was the thing. Scare the doctor into telling!

Darrel carefully opened the operating room door. The doctor's back was to him. He stood at a table across the room. Darrel exerted a powerful force of will and almost instantly his body shrank until he was less than a foot tall. And now he was the invincible Doll Man, nemesis of criminals!

He ran across the room silently and, when Dr. Brunn went to a steam closet to get an instrument, the Doll Man leaped onto the table and assumed the posture of an ornament. The doctor came back.

"Hello, doctor!"

Brunn looked around, said, "Huh?"

"Here, doctor! In front of you!"

The doctor's eyes swung down on the tiny man. The Doll Man winked one eye and waved a hand. Dr. Brunn gasped and dropped a retort.

"What th—" Dr. Brunn blinked several times.

"Have no fear, doctor," said the Doll Man. "I'm the little man who wasn't there—but is. I'm the genii of the operating room."

Brunn's mouth hung open. The sweat beaded his forehead. He swayed a bit, clutched at the table.

"Just tell me, doctor," said the Doll Man, "where you get those corneas, and I'll leave quietly."

"Why—why—I g-get them from blind people," chattered Brunn. "Dead ones. Their eyes aren't any good to them. But their corneas are—to the sightless."

The little Doll Man nodded. "Right. Then while it may be somewhat unethical, what you do is not exactly against the law, is it?"

Brunn shook his head. "Not at all. I have a few undertakers working for me. And doctors. I pay them well. I charge well, too, whenever I effect a cure."

The Doll Man smiled. "Well, I happen to know that Leroy is perfectly satisfied, doctor. Now I'll leave you. You may be wrong, yet—well, if anyone is interested in where you get those corneas, let 'em find out. . . So long, doc!"
